Tourist killed by shark in Egypt

By Donald Macintyre

Monday, 6 December 2010

A German woman was killed on Saturday by a shark at the Sinai's most popular Red Sea resort only a day after the Egyptian authorities had declared the waters safe in the wake of a series of other attacks.

The tourist, reportedly aged about 70, died after the shark tore at her arm as she was swimming leisurely of the coast of Sharm el Sheikh. The resort attracts an estimated three million holidaymakers a year because of the spectacularly rich variety of marine life enjoyed by divers and snorkellers.

Beaches had been closed to tourists for 48 hours at the end of last week after the mauling of three tourists from the former Soviet Union. The Egyptian Environment Ministry announced on Thursday evening that the two sharks suspected of the attacks had been caught and killed.

Then on Saturday, the all-clear was given after divers from the Chamber of Diving and Water Sports (CDWS) and the Environment Ministry moved through popular diving sites in an effort to ensure they were safe. The Ministry also ordered diving centres to provide staff to supervise beaches and watch the waters for possible shark movements.

But on Sunday, as the German woman's death was confirmed, the CDWS warned its members to clear the water immediately. Jochen Van Lysebettens, the manager of the Red Sea Diving College, told Sky TV that the dead woman was a regular visitor to the luxury Hyatt Regency hotel at the resort. He added: "The woman was just swimming to stay in shape. Suddenly there was a scream of 'Help!' and a lot of violence in the water. The lifeguard got her on the reef and he noticed she was severely wounded. She was rushed to hospital where nothing could be done to save her life."

When the beaches were re-opened on Saturday, there was a local NGO, the Hurghada Environmental Protection and Conservation Association, which cast doubt on the decision, arguing that at least one of the sharks was not the one responsible for the three earlier attacks.
