QUICK RECOVERY

Even if you aren't an elite athlete, a sports injury can really affect your daily life. If exercise is one of your daily habits, it can be hard to change that, even if it's only for a short time. However, there are many things athletes of all levels can do to make it easier to heal from an injury.

One of the most important things athletes can do to help their bodies heal is to pay careful attention to their diets. Of course, most serious athletes should already be doing this, but they need to be especially careful about what they eat when they're recovering from an injury. Proteins, such as chicken or fish are important for repairing sprains and pulled muscles. Fruits, vegetables, and healthy fats like avocados and nuts are also important for muscle repair. While many athletes may feel like they should reduce calories when an injury stops them from exercising, they shouldn't. According to some studies, the body burns 15-30% more calories when it's repairing an injury, so injured athletes need plenty of healthy calories. For athletes, diet is an important part of training, but it's also key to recovering from injury.

Depending on the type of injury, many athletes may be able to continue exercising while they recover. However, they often have to vary the types of exercise they do. Cycling, swimming, or yoga can be great recovery activities for athletes whose sports usually involve running. While an injury isn't something most people want to experience, it can give athletes an opportunity to try new activities, activities that may actually make them stronger and lead to better performance in their main sport. If it's impossible to continue exercising, the recovery time can be used to focus on improving in different ways.

Some athletes try meditation, while others use the time to support their team members by volunteering at or cheering others on during competitions. Trying different types of exercise or activities can help injured athletes get something positive from their recovery.

Sometimes the most difficult part of recovering from an injury is keeping a positive attitude. Some injured athletes experience depression when they are suddenly unable to exercise. If it's a daily habit, the sudden change in routine can be difficult to accept. But, having a positive attitude can help. Many athletes stay positive by staying connected to their sport. They watch their sport on TV, attend competitions, and make plans for their own future in the sport. They also use the time to think carefully about how they got injured and to work on getting stronger in order to prevent future injuries. Staying positive helps athletes not just recover from an injury but also to improve after.

No one ever wishes for an injury. But the right attitude toward recovery, both physical and mental, can help athletes heal quickly and completely. And for some, what they learn from their recovery can actually help them perform better when they return to their sport.
