The Olympic Games are a modern international sports event. The best athletes from many countries all over the world compete in different sports. This is one of the symbols of the games. It has a white background with five interlocking rings: blue, yellow, black, green and red. Why these six colours? Because they appear on all the national flags of the world. The five rings represent the five inhabited continents of the world: America, Europe, Asia, Africa and Oceania.

This is a character that represents not only the country where the Olympic Games are taking place but also the Olympic spirit. It is usually an animal: a tiger (Seoul, 1988), a dog (Barcelona, 1992) an eagle (Los Angeles, 1984). But it can also be a creature: Fuwa (Beijing, 2008), Wenlock and Mandeville (London, 2012), Vinicius and Tom (Rio, 2016).

The best athletes in each sports event get medals: gold for the first place, silver for the second place and bronze for the third place. However, the most important thing about the games is not to win, but to take part.

This tradition comes from a long time ago — from ancient Greece. Months before each games, a torch is lit at Olympia in Greece and athletes carry it across the world to the city where the new Olympic Games take place. The flame travels through many countries and it remains lit until the last day of the games. During the closing ceremony, it is put out.

During the two to three summer weeks, athletes compete in more than 30 sports disciplines: gymnastics, athletics, rowing, sailing, badminton, wrestling and many others. The modern Summer Olympics started in 1896.

The Paralympic Games are the games for athletes with a disability¹. They are held every four years in the same year as the Olympic Games. They are parallel to the Olympic Games and that is where their name comes from. Thousands of athletes from many countries compete in the events such as: wheelchair basketball, cycling, swimming, athletics events, wheelchair tennis and many other events.

Figure skating, ice hockey, skiing, snowboarding and bobsleigh are some of the ice and snow sports that you can see during the games. There aren't so many sports as during the Summer Olympics, but they are also interesting. The first Winter Games were organised in France in 1924.
