The Special Olympics

The Special Olympics were founded in Chicago, Illinois in 1968, and since then they have become an important sporting event both in the United States and around the world. 1 In addition to these local and national competitions, there are Special Olympic World Games. There are winter and summer World Games which both take place every two years.

So what is special about the Special Olympics? The program was designed for athletes who want to compete in important sport events but have intellectual disabilities.

2 One is to encourage these people to improve their fitness. Another is to help them feel confident and more comfortable in the world. In addition, the Games help create positive public feelings about people with disabilities.

The Special Olympics feature a wide variety of sports including athletics, gymnastics, swimming, sailing, cycling and judo. 3 For example, in sailing competitions, each Special Olympics athlete is paired with a trained coach. This person can assist the competitor if necessary and help maintain a safe situation. If a boat contains over three crew members, the majority of them must be Special Olympics athletes.

For cycling competitions the rules are different. In this case, the cyclists who are not visually impaired race by themselves. 4 This person, known as a 'pilot', helps them follow the course and avoid dangerous situations. Training for the cycling competition starts with practising riding in single rows. It also includes doing simple repairs and reviewing the rules of the race. 5 The athletes' health and happiness are always top priority.

The inspirational motto of the Special Olympics is, 'Let me win. But if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt.' Today, 5.7 million athletes around the world share that mission.
