F Read the comments to the article. Then match the statements to Mansi, Nadine, Boris, or Maria. You can write more than one person.

Mansi22

I don't agree that it's only young people who use social media. Nor do I agree with the way the writer used the word "addicted." He said that young people were addicted to social media, but he didn't include examples to support it.

NaturalNadine89

I agree with Mansi. I think adults believe we're addicted because they think we don't use social media wisely. Last night my mom asked me three times if I had logged off. Three times! The other day she asked me in front of my friends if I had seen this meme about cats. It was so embarrassing! So, no, I don't think we are addicted to social media. It's just that our parents don't trust us.

BorisC78

Hey guys. I'm sorry to disagree with you. I am a dad and a teacher, and in my opinion young people should use social media less. As the writer mentioned in the article, today 7 out of 10 of us use social media to read the news or share information on a daily basis.

I realize that it's the way you keep in touch with each other and catch up with all that's going on, but you need other activities. Just yesterday my son told me that he had been online for seven hours straight.

MariaMaria

I'd like to comment on something that Mansi said about the age groups that use social media. I agree with Mansi that not only young people use social media. I am 51 years old. Recently I was asked in a survey if I knew what "memes" and "clickbait" were. Excuse me! I may be older but I know just as much as younger people about trending topics.

1 This person uses an example of someone in his/her family to prove a point. _____

2 This person doesn't think you have to be young to know a lot about social media. _____

3 This person disagrees that young people are addicted to social media. _____

4 This person thinks older generations worry too much about how much young people use social media. _____

5 This person referred to something from the article. _____
