Knowing Who We Are

The Aboriginal People of Canada came from Asia thousands of years ago. They were living in this country a long time before explorers from Europe discovered North America.

The Aboriginal people were the first people of Canada. They have many different spiritual beliefs and cultural traditions. They have a special relationship with nature because they depended on it for survival. Today, the word Aboriginal refers to three main groups of people:

- First Nations
- Metis
- Inuit

The biggest group of Aboriginal people in Canada is the First Nations. First Nations people make up 65% of the Aboriginal People in Canada. Until European settlers came to North America, the First Nations people lived all across Canada. In 1876, the government of Canada made an agreement with the First Nations people. It was called the Indian Act. The Indian Act gave the First Nations people large areas of land where they could live. These areas of land were called reserves or reserve land. Half of the First Nations people live on reserve land today, and the other half live off reserve land, mostly in cities.

The second biggest group of Aboriginal people in Canada is Metis. Metis are descendants of first Nations mothers and French European fathers. These European fathers were fur traders. Most Metis live in Canada's Prairie Provinces. They make up 30% of the Aboriginal people in Canada.

The third group of Aboriginal people in Canada is Inuit. Inuit means "the people" in the Inuktitut language. The Inuit live in small communities in the Arctic (northern Canada). They live off the land by hunting and fishing. They make up 4% of the Aboriginal people in Canada.
