Reading

A Read the article about the Special Olympics.

The Special Olympics

The Special Olympics were founded in Chicago, Illinois in 1968 and since then they have become an important sporting event both in the United States and around the world. Today there are competitions in 180 countries featuring 30 different summer and winter sports. In addition to these local and national competitions, there are Special Olympic Games. There are Winter and Summer Games and they alternate every two years. So what is special about the Special Olympics? The program was designed for athletes who want to compete in important sport events, but have intellectual disabilities. The program has several important goals. One is to encourage these people to become more physically fit. Another is to help them feel confident and more comfortable in the world. In addition, the games help create a positive public attitude toward a group of people that is often forgotten.

The Special Olympics feature a wide variety of sports including swimming, sailing, basketball, cycling, football and bowling. Because of the participants' limitations, the rules of the games have been changed somewhat. For example, in sailing competitions, each Special Olympics athlete is paired with a trained coach. This person can assist the competitor if necessary and help maintain a safe situation. If a boat contains over three crew members, the majority of them must be Special Olympics athletes.

For cycling competitions, however, the rules are different. In this case, the athletes who are not visually impaired race by themselves, with race coordinators supervising the competition from a distance. However, cyclists who can't see very well or are completely blind, are accompanied by a pilot to help them follow the course and avoid dangerous situations. Training for the cycling competition starts with practising riding in single rows. It also includes doing simple bicycle repairs and reviewing the rules of the race. Competitors also learn about general bike safety, including the importance of wearing the proper clothing and helmet.

In recent years, the Special Olympics College, which is a network of college and university students that supports the Special Olympics, has become an important part of the program. Through this organisation, college students work for the benefit of individuals with intellectual disabilities. This includes not only helping with training for the sporting competitions, but also working toward the increased acceptance of all people, regardless of their physical or mental ability.

Along with their mission, the inspirational motto of the Special Olympics is, 'Let me win. But if I cannot win, let me be brave in the attempt.'
