Reading 1: Right/Wrong/ Doesn't say

It has been a long time since our last meeting. How are you? I am feeling great because I passed all the exams at school. The maths and chemistry tests were a little hard, but the others were easy. I got 5 As and 3A+s . My teacher was surprised at my test results. He said many students couldn't pass the tests because they didn't have a good study plan. He was so pleased that I studied very hard and could manage my time well for my study with regular breaks.

Next Friday, I am going to have a presentation on students' problems in my social studies class. I think the most common problems are exam stress and broken friendship. Some others may have arguments with their parents or could not stop from social media addition. These are bad things. If there are any other problems that you can point out, please let me know.

By the way, I am going on a field trip to the zoo with my classmate tomorrow. We will learn about the animals' lives in the natural environment and the importance of animals to us. I am really excited about it. How about you, Tommy? Are you going on a school trip too!

Reading 3: It is very difficult to define a culture. Some people say it is the food of a group of people, and others say it is the music they love. These things are important, and they are often very different from culture to culture. But for me, a culture is the normal conversations of people. This is much more important than food and drink.

Before travelling to a new country, most people learn how to say hello and goodbye, and maybe they find out about something like using your right hand to pick up food. But if you get those things wrong, people will just laugh. The first thing to learn is about topics of conversation – what is OK and what is not.

In your own culture, you do not have to worry about someone's meaning most of the time. But in another culture, you must always think, 'What does this person mean?' If a British person says, 'It's lovely to meet you', do they mean, 'I want to meet you again soon and be your friend' or 'I hope we don't meet again'? No. It's just a polite way of ending a conversation.

Never come late for a meeting with a British person unless it's a party. Then you should come ten minutes late. Finally, in some cultures, guests are expected to bring gifts such as flowers, chocolates or even money, but in British culture, hosts of parties do not expect you to bring anything.
