"Everyone is good at something." That was what Ms. Lowen always said. But Jake was not so sure. He hated doing math. He wasn't much of a reader. He couldn't toss a ball. And he had no idea what he wanted to do when he grew up.

His best friend, Charlie, was going to be a firefighter. Charlie knew what he wanted. It seemed he had always known. He was strong and smart, so he would probably pass all the tests. And his friend Kyle was going to be a teacher, like his dad. Kyle loved math and was always winning contests. "What am I good at?" Jake wondered. "What will I be someday?"

Sometimes, after school, Jake visited his uncle at the restaurant where Uncle Mike worked. He liked to watch Uncle Mike stir sauces. He liked helping out.

Sometimes he said things like, "This needs a little more pepper," when he tested Uncle Mike's recipes. He began to read cookbooks. "Let's try this!" he'd tell Mike when he found something that seemed good. They experimented together. Jake got good at measuring. He learned to convert a recipe for six to a recipe for ten. He liked playing with ingredients. "Instead of peaches, let's try pears in this cake," he would suggest.

The school food fair was coming up. Most students brought in things that their parents had made. Jake decided to try a recipe he'd made up - pineapple pizza. At first, when he placed it on the table, some people said, "Yick. That sounds awful." Then, one by one, some of his friends decided to try it.
