

93 because, so, so that

Why do you want to join the police, Andrew?

Because I think it's a very interesting job.

Any other reasons?

Yes, so that I can help people.

1 because

Because joins two sentences and explains why:
Everyone loves Johnny Depp. He's a brilliant actor.
Everyone loves Johnny Depp because he's a brilliant actor.

We use because of + noun:

All the trains are late because of the bad weather.

But we cannot use because of + noun and verb:

~~✗ All the trains are late because of it is snowing.~~

✓ All the trains are late because of the snow.

We can use because and because of at the beginning of a sentence. When we do this, we put a comma (,) after the first clause:

Because he's a brilliant actor, everyone loves him.

Because of the bad weather, all the trains are late.

2 so

So gives the result of something:

Lucia didn't work hard so she failed her Spanish exam.

Summers are getting hotter so different types of plants are growing.

3 so that, to + infinitive

We use so that to say why a person does something. Can and could often come after so that:

Andrew wants to join the police so that he can help people.

She worked really hard so that she could go to university.

We can also use to + infinitive instead of so that:

I'm joining the police so that I can help people.

I'm joining the police to help people.

NATURAL ENGLISH In everyday English, to + infinitive is more common than so that:

Liz has gone to the shops so that she can buy some bread.

→ Liz has gone to the shops to buy some bread.

Practice

1 Match the two parts of the sentences to tell Antonio's story.

- |  |                                     |
