

MOCK TEST - READING COMPREHENSION

Traditional Families: Britain vs. Vietnam

Structure: In Britain, the traditional family has been a nuclear unit – parents and children living independently, often with grandparents nearby but in separate households. Conversely, Vietnamese families have typically been extended, with multiple generations sharing a home. This creates a strong sense of community and filial piety (respect for elders) in Vietnamese families.

Communication: Both cultures emphasize being truthful and honest. However, expressing opinions can differ. British children might be encouraged to voice their ideas openly during meals. In Vietnamese families, respect for elders may lead to children waiting to be spoken to and using indirect language.

Manners: Both cultures value good table manners. British families might have set mealtimes with formal etiquette, while Vietnamese families might have a more flexible approach, but politeness and respect remain paramount. Saying "please" and "thank you" is ingrained in both cultures, a sign of a good upbringing.

Chores: Helping with chores is expected in both traditions. British families might assign specific tasks, while Vietnamese families might have a more fluid approach where everyone contributes. The emphasis remains on contributing to the well-being of the family unit. Understanding these differences fosters respect and appreciation for diverse family structures.

Multiple Choice Questions:

1. Traditionally, which family unit is more common in Britain?

- a) Nuclear family
- b) Extended family
- c) Single-parent family
- d) Multigenerational family

2. What is filial piety?

- a) Fear of elders
- b) Respect for elders
- c) Financial dependence on elders
- d) Sharing jokes with elders

3. How might Vietnamese children show respect during meals?

- a) Talking loudly and interrupting
- b) Waiting to be spoken to and using polite language
- c) Arguing with their parents about food choices
- d) Leaving the table without permission

4. What is the similarity between British and Vietnamese families regarding chores?

- a) Only children are expected to help.
- b) Chores are seen as punishment.
- c) Everyone contributes to the household.
- d) Chores are unimportant.

5. What is the main point of the passage?

- a) To criticize traditional family structures.
- b) To highlight the superiority of one culture's family values.
- c) To promote understanding of different family traditions.
- d) To show how families are becoming more similar globally.

True/False Questions:

1. Traditionally, British families have a strong emphasis on independence for children.
2. Vietnamese families typically have more formal mealtimes than British families.
3. Both British and Vietnamese cultures believe honesty is unimportant in family life.
4. Saying "please" and "thank you" is not expected in traditional Vietnamese families.
5. Helping with chores is a way to show respect for elders in Vietnamese families.