V. Read the passage and choose the correct answer A, B, C, or D to each question.

Nowadays, it is becoming more common for individuals or nuclear families to live separately, rather than with extended family members. However, in my opinion, living in an extended family can offer many advantages.

On the one hand, nuclear families can provide benefits such as more focused attention from parents and reduced household expenses. With fewer family members, parents can spend more time teaching and guiding their children, which can positively impact their development. Additionally, with fewer people to support, parents may have more financial resources to invest in things like education and healthcare.

On the other hand, extended families can offer many advantages as well. For example, in times of need, there will always be someone available to help. When facing a financial burden or other difficult situation, other family members can provide support and assistance. Additionally, living with extended family members provides the opportunity to build stronger relationships and spend more quality time together. In some cases, extended families may also pool their resources to help each other financially, which can reduce individual financial burdens.

In conclusion, while nuclear families can offer some benefits, I believe that living in an extended family can be a better option for many people. The support and sense of community that come with living in a large family group can be valuable and help individuals to feel more comfortable and secure in their daily lives.
