Queen of the Waves

There have always been people who push themselves to their physical limits to achieve something that no one else has ever done before. Gertrude Ederle was one of those athletes who not only broke records but changed the way women were perceived and inspired generations of young female athletes after her.

Gertrude Ederle was an American competitive swimmer who won gold for her country at the 1924 Olympic Games and went down in history for her great achievements. In June 1925, at the age of 18, Ederle became the first woman to swim the length of New York Bay. She completed the swim in 7 hours 11 minutes, breaking the men's record. That same summer, she made her first attempt at crossing the notoriously cold and choppy English Channel, a feat only five men had successfully completed. Unfortunately, eight hours and 46 minutes into her challenge, her coach, Jabez Wolff, decided to stop the swim due to concern that she was swallowing too much saltwater. Ederle disagreed with her coach's decision and decided to replace him with T.W. Burgess, a skilled Channel swimmer.

At 7:08 on August 6, 1926, nearly one year after her failed attempt at what was considered the swimmer's Everest, Ederle plunged into the sea at Cape Gris-Nez in France. The water was particularly cold but calm as she set out. However, by mid-afternoon Ederle was confronted with rain, wind, and heavy swells that forced her to swim the equivalent of 35 miles to cover the 21-mile distance. Twice, she encountered squalls along her route and her coach urged her to end the swim. Ederle's father and sister, though, who were riding in the boat along with Burgess, agreed with Ederle that she should stay the course. Her father had promised her a new car if she finished the swim and called out to her in the water to remind her that the car was hers only if she finished. This motivation and her determination kept her focused and at 9:04 pm she reached the English coast at Kingston. She had crossed the English Channel in a time of 14 hours, 31 minutes. She not only became the first woman to do so, but she also shattered the previous record by more than two hours.

After the swim, Ederle became known as 'Queen of the Waves'. She told a reporter from The New York Times that she knew it could be done, that it had to be done and that she did it. Her record-breaking time clearly proved that women were not physically inferior to men and were capable of great athletic feats. Her determination and hard work demonstrated the potential for women who practised hard and maintained their dedication. She was among the first sports heroines to dispel the myth of the 'weaker sex' and her achievements still serve today as inspiration for female athletes. She spent most of her adult life teaching deaf children how to swim. She passed away in 2003 at the age of 98.
