Reading (20 pts)

G. Read the article about how technology is helping disabled people with their employment. Then match the summary sentences 1–6 to the correct paragraphs A–E. There is one summary sentence that you don't need.

Helping disabled people to work

A Thanks to modern technology, many aspects of life are continuing to improve for disabled people, and this is especially true in terms of work. The job market is tough, and it can be even tougher for those living with disabilities. Too often, not only do they face ignorance and prejudice in finding jobs in the first place, but they can also encounter difficulties in getting to a place of work, and being mobile once there.

B Getting a job in the first place can be difficult if you are unable to travel easily to an interview. But there are now career fairs which people can visit on the internet. Participants can then 'meet' employers and have interviews in an online environment, rather than going to a face-to-face meeting.

C 'Meeting' an employer over the internet also means that people can be chosen for their skills and abilities without their disabilities being seen and prejudicing a potential employer. One man, for example, has limited speech and hasn't been able to hear since he was a child. However, after having an interview online, he was chosen for a particular job because of his excellent writing skills, and he now works as an editor for a magazine. Most of his work is focused on reading and writing online, and he communicates with colleagues and clients by email.

D For disabled people who do have jobs outside their own homes, travelling to and from work can present a real problem, especially if they have to use buses and trains. However, the development of driverless cars could make things much easier. Allowed on roads in the UK from 2015, these vehicles take control of functions such as steering, accelerating, indicating and braking, in a similar way to how planes are flown on autopilot. Computer vision looks out for pedestrians, cyclists and other potential dangers.

E And for some people, advances in technology are helping them get over the physical disability itself. For example, one company, called 'iWalk', provides people with robotic legs controlled by a computer. The company's chief technologist has personal experience of working with a disability. Following a climbing expedition in the early '80s, he had to have both legs removed below the knee because of frostbite. Thanks to his own technology, he is now even able to go climbing once more, and he is confident that many other people can be helped back to work using similar products.

1. A transport revolution _____
2. The world of work in the past _____
3. The many challenges facing disabled people _____
4. Someone who has created his own solution _____
5. A problem solved by the internet _____
6. Focusing on talents, not disabilities _____

H. Read the article again and complete the sentences. Use one or two words from the text for each answer.

1. People who have _____ can find it particularly hard to get a job.
2. Disabled people looking for a job can now get in touch with _____ using the internet.
3. One man found employment with a _____ because he's very good at writing.
4. The introduction of _____ vehicles will help disabled people travel to work.
5. The chief technologist at iWalk knows from his own _____ what it's like to be disabled.
