In the past, Vietnamese people used to send messages by writing letters. They would carefully express their thoughts on paper, put the letters in envelopes, and send them through the postal service. Writing letters was a process that took time and patience, but it was deeply appreciated because of the personal touch it offered.

Nowadays, things have changed dramatically. New tools like emails and instant messages have become an integral part of our daily communication. They offer speed and convenience, allowing people to communicate in real time, irrespective of geographical boundaries.

However, some traditions haven't changed completely. Some people still enjoy writing letters by hand. They think that handwritten letters are special because they show the writer's feelings, making the communication more personal and sincere. The time and effort invested in writing each letter add to its emotional value.

In summary, even though technology has revolutionised the way we communicate, the tradition of writing letters holds a special place in Vietnamese culture. People still find something special in putting their thoughts on paper and sending them to others and it creates a personal connection that we cannot do with digital communication.
