Earth is the only planet in our galaxy that can support life. Scientists estimate that Earth is home to about 300,000 plant species, over 600,000 species of fungi, and about ten million animal species. However, Earth has not always been a welcoming home to life forms. About 600 - 800 million years ago, Earth underwent several extreme climate changes known as ice ages, during which global temperatures dropped dramatically and the polar ice expanded to cover much of the earth. The climate became so cold that some scientists believe Earth nearly or completely froze; this is known as the "snowball Earth" theory. There may have been four such periods. Because most of the sun's energy would have been reflected back into space by ice, the planet's average temperature would have been about -50 degrees Celsius.

If "snowball Earth" did exist, luckily we were not around there to feel the chill, as only microscopic and simple organisms existed then.
