Honest man returns $9,000 cash

If it seems that you only read bad news in the newspaper these days, then you'll enjoy this story.

Jason Baxter was driving home last week when he saw a book lying in the road. He didn't know who the book belonged to, but he thought, "If that were mine, I'd want someone to return it to me." So he stopped and picked it up. It was an appointment book. Baxter opened one pocket and found what he was looking for—identification—so he could return it to its owner. Then he looked in another pocket and found $9,000 in cash.

For some people, this would be a moral dilemma, but not for Baxter. When he got home, he called the police and told them about the appointment book with the cash in it. "That's just the right thing to do," Baxter said.

The police returned the book to its owner, Karrie Jo Blakston. Ms. Blakston said she had all of that money with her to pay for her wedding. She had put the appointment book on top of her car as she was getting in. But she was thinking about other things, and she forgot about the appointment book. As she drove away, the book fell off her car.

Ms. Blakston was extremely happy to have the money back. But she was even happier to know that there are still good, honest people in the world.
