

Many students today are starting university online, but some wonder if it's as good as going to campus. I disagree that "starting university online offers the same experience as attending in person" and I have many reasons to support my point of view.

The first reason is that students learning from home can't use campus facilities, like libraries, science labs, and study rooms. On-campus students have access to these resources, which can help them in their studies. For example, in subjects like science, students need labs to do experiments, which is hard to do online.

Another reason is that online classes can make it hard to practice real skills. Some subjects, like art, engineering, or nursing, require students to work with their hands and practice in real-life settings. Online courses often cannot offer this practical experience, making it harder for students to learn these skills.

In conclusion, while online learning can be helpful, it doesn't give the full experience of being on campus. Using campus resources, and practicing hands-on are all important parts of university that online classes cannot fully provide.
