Deep-rooted culture

Laila was a young woman visiting her family in the United Arab Emirates for the first time in years. She was excited to experience Emirati culture, having heard stories from her parents about their traditions. Her family lived in a small village outside Dubai, where they acquired many customs that connected them to their heritage. Upon her arrival, Laila was greeted with a warm smile from her uncle, who offered her a small cup of coffee, traditional Arabic coffee, and dates. She had learned that serving coffee and dates was a symbol of hospitality, representing the Emirati value of generosity and warmth.

The next morning, her uncle invited her to a majlis, a gathering where men and women of the community come together to discuss important issues. Laila sat beside her aunt, listening as people shared stories and offered advice to one another. She admired how the majlis reflected a strong sense of community, where everyone was valued and respected.

Later, Laila observed her cousins dressed in traditional dress. The men wore kanduras, long white robes that symbolized respect and modesty, while the women wore abayas, black cloaks that reflected similar values. During her stay, she learned about the Emirati customs surrounding festivals like Eid Al-Fitr and Eid Al-Adha. During these festivals, families came together to pray, share meals, and exchange gifts, celebrating togetherness and faith.

One evening, Laila was invited to watch al Ayala, a traditional dance performed with sticks and drums. She was captivated by the rhythm and unity of the performers. Laila realized that the UAE, while modern and forward-looking, retained a strong connection to its cultural roots. Through her family's stories and customs, she saw the harmonious balance between tradition and progress in the UAE.
