An Extreme Adventure: Visiting the South Pole by Sally Jones

The South Pole is so cold that you can freeze to death if you aren't careful. Most people wouldn't travel thousands of kilometres to spend time there. However, Simon DGLISH is not just anyone. He is a courageous and adventurous man. He and some friends decided to hike to the South Pole along the same route that Captain Robert Falcon Scott followed in 1912. And to make things even more interesting, they decided to use the same type of clothing, equipment and food that the heroic British explorer had used. They did this knowing that these things hadn't protected Scott very well. In fact, Scott and four of his men died, but this didn't stop DGLISH and his friends.

To get ready, DGLISH and the three other men trained for 90 minutes a day. To get stronger, they pulled old car tyres through London parks and to get used to freezing temperatures, they rode exercise bikes in a friend's walk-in freezer. The old-fashioned clothing was a challenge as well. They used blankets to make old-style jackets and had boots made of reindeer-skin. However, DGLISH admitted that he and his friends didn't know how the sledge would perform.

The team wanted to raise money for medical research. They managed to get $100,000 from Numis Securities, their main sponsor. The Mail on Sunday newspaper also gave them money for their story. Unfortunately, their expedition didn't start very well at all. They started pulling the four-metre long sledge, but it wouldn't move. 'We couldn't believe it,' DGLISH remembers. He said that everyone had the same look on their face; we were all thinking the same thing. 'Which one of you isn't pulling?' Finally, they got the sledge moving. They pulled it for two hours at a time, eight hours a day, in -37°C weather.

DGLISH and his friends were greeted by about fifty South Pole scientists as they crossed the finishing line. DGLISH describes one way they celebrated their arrival at the South Pole. 'We played this little trick where you stand right at the Pole and put your hand on the marker and walk around it. You can actually walk around the world in eight steps. It was such good fun and the scientists took a video of it!' Not only was the journey successful, but it also made $640,000 for research!

11 What is Sally Jones doing in the article?

- A explaining how dangerous it is to visit the South Pole
- B encouraging more people to travel to the South Pole
- C describing a fundraising expedition to the South Pole
- D giving advice on how to reach the South Pole safely

12 What does Sally say about the preparations for the expedition?

- A The team prepared well for every aspect of the expedition.
- B The team didn't have to train as hard as they did.
- C The team used the same training methods as Captain Scott's team.
- D The team was embarrassed to train in strange clothes.

13 What was the team's attitude towards their problems with the sledge?

- A They all thought that they needed to pull it longer.
- B They argued about who was going to pull it.
- C They encouraged each other to carry on pulling it.
- D They started to blame each other about not pulling it enough.

14 Why did Darglish and his men do that trick?

- A The South Pole scientists told them to do it.
- B They thought it was an entertaining way of ending their journey.
- C It's a traditional way to celebrate reaching the South Pole.
- D It was another way of making more money for charity.

15 What might Darglish have written in his diary about the expedition?

- A I hope more people will follow Captain Scott's example. This expedition wasn't as tough as I'd thought.
- B It would've been an easier expedition if I had a better team.
- C There were times I didn't think we would succeed, but I'm glad we did.
- D I was really surprised to see the South Pole scientists greet us like that.
