Bun cha became an international attention overnight after US President Barack Obama and celebrity chef Anthony Bourdain were pictured eating the dish together in Hanoi. The sauce is what makes the dish spectacular; a good sauce will give a balance between the sweetness of the meat and the saltiness of the fish sauce. The Hanoi traditional dish is served only at lunchtime and comes with rice vermicelli, fresh veggies and herbs such as basils, coriander.

There are many reasons for these differences in eating habits. Culture plays a big role, as does climate. In countries where it is hot, people tend to eat lighter meals, while in countries where it is cold, people tend to eat heavier meals. Availability of food also plays a role. In countries where food is scarce, people eat whatever they can get, while in countries where food is plentiful, people have more choices.

In tropical countries like Thailand, meals often include fresh fruits and salads, while countries with colder climates, such as Norway, tend to focus on hearty stews and dishes rich in calories. Moreover, globalization has contributed to a fusion of cuisines, allowing people to explore and incorporate diverse ingredients and recipes into their diets.
