1. Teachers' Low Pay

Unfortunately, most teachers' income in public schools still leaves much to be desired. That's why young specialists balk at joining the state sector where the pay is a [] and the work schedule is grueling and those with their dignity still intact just leave []. And the things are going downhill.

2. Overcrowded classes

Having a classroom [] does nobody any favours. The consequences of overcrowded classrooms run deeper than too many students in one class. It includes the strain it places on teachers, the limited access to resources and support for students, and the resulting decline in attendance and motivation.

3. The Use of Smartphones

As a teacher, I am thrilled that the UN has called for a ban on mobile phones in schools (26 July 2023). From my observations, the advance of smartphones has propelled the [] of pupils and can have [] consequences. I believe that smartphones should be regarded as potentially destabilizing as cars or alcohol. It must be possible to make a phone that functions only as a phone, which children all ages can have, in order to be in safe contact with their parents/carers.

4. Homework Overload

Hefty homework, a daily headache for kids and parents, is par for the course in many schools. Poor students really do [] these days with so much work piled on them. Assignments done at home are sapping more and more of free time, so that children have a [] of squeezing in some time for outside activities, sports, or just relaxing. Research showed that excessive homework is associated with high stress levels, headaches, exhaustion, sleep deprivation, weight loss and stomach problems.

5. Funding

Schools are grappling with insufficient funding. As school budgets reach breaking point, there are inevitable consequences for the quality of education being provided to young people, as well as the working conditions of school staff. On a daily basis, this means larger class sizes, reduced access to student support services, cuts in extra-curricular activities and facilities that [] the standards required. Less money should be [] to middle management and red-tape projects.
