NO PHONES ALLOWED

Last Saturday afternoon I was with my friends in a new café in Seattle. The place resembled other coffee shops where we often ¹ over a cup of coffee or tea. It was packed with a mix of fancy tables, plush chairs and couches. However, there was one noticeable difference: no phone, tablet or laptop was in sight. Instead, people were ² with each other: talking and playing board games. The café is a Wi-Fi-free zone and it ³ to encourage face to face conversation by imposing a ban on electronic devices. ⁴ most cafés, packed with people working on their mobile devices, the place welcomes anyone who is looking forward to having an old-fashioned chat.

Similar places have popped up in other cities across North America and Europe recently. Are people finally beginning to realise that being always on causes ⁵ to their physical and mental health?

Big screen movies that predicted the future

For ages, science fiction writers ¹ us with their brave visions of the world to come. There are quite a few examples of science fiction novels which predicted the development of real technologies. For example, H.G. Wells in his novel The War of the Worlds (1897) ² travelling in a spacecraft.

With the advent of motion pictures, science fiction writers' ideas about the future were brought to life on the big screen. It is impossible to name all the future technologies shown in films ³, but there have been several science fiction films that had given very accurate predictions of technologies before these were actually invented. One of them is a tablet computer, a prototype of which can be seen in Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1969). The ⁴ used there look very much like the tablets we use today.

Another real technology predicted in a sci-fi movie is the ⁵ eyewear that the characters of Back to the Future Part II use in the film. Also, the sports company Nike released self-lacing shoes in late 2016. So it's probably safe to say that some of the technologies from the more recent sci-fi movies will also ⁶ or later become a reality.
