RESEARCHERS PAY PEOPLE TO STAY IN BED

Getting paid $23,000 to stay in bed for two months sounds pretty good. That's what a medical research team is offering to 24 volunteers.

Researchers are looking for volunteers to help them study the effects of weightlessness on the human body by spending 60 days lying down. Lying in bed isn't exactly the same as being weightless, but it affects the body in a similar way.

When astronauts spend a long time in an environment with no gravity, their bodies are affected in many ways; for example, their hearts don't pump as hard, their muscles become weaker because they no longer have to work against gravity, and their bones may break more easily. There may also be changes in their immune systems and sleep habits.

The goal of the present study, which will take 88 days altogether, is to measure the effects of weightlessness, and also to find ways to prevent problems. During the first two weeks, the volunteers' levels of health and fitness will be measured. Then, they will spend 60 days lying in bed with their heads slightly lower than their bodies. They will have to do everything while lying down, including eating, brushing their teeth, and going to the bathroom. The rule is that they must have at least one shoulder touching the bed at all times. Half of the volunteers in the study will be taking special food supplements to see if they help reduce the health problems caused by weightlessness. The last two weeks of the study will be spent taking more measurements and trying to build up their strength again.

Volunteers must be men between the ages of 20 and 45 who are in perfect health and physically active. They must be non-smokers and have no allergies.
