José Tuki is a 30-year-old artist from Easter Island in the South Pacific Ocean. He is sitting on Anakena beach and he is looking at enormous statues of people – the moai. They are hundreds of years old. People made the statues in a different place and then they moved them 11 miles to the beach.” How did they do it?” Tuki asks.

The first Polynesians arrived at Easter Island by canoe hundreds of years ago. This small island is 2,150 miles west of South America. These days, 12 flights arrive every week from Chile, Peru and Tahiti. In 2011, 50,000 tourists flew to Easter Island to see the moai.

There are different ideas about how the Rapa Nui people moved the moai. Some historians think the ancestors used ropes and wood and pulled the statues along the ground. The scientist and writer Jared Diamond thinks that many people moved the statues. He also thinks that the people cut down the trees on the island because they needed the wood to make the statues. They also needed a lot of space without trees to grow food.

But archaeologists Terry Hunt of the University of Hawaii and Carl Lipo of California State University Long Beach don't agree with Jared Diamond. They say that it was possible to move the statues with a small number of people and a system of ropes. José Tuki says, “I want to know the truth, but maybe the moai are very special and powerful - so it's not a good idea to know the truth”.
