To start off with what has the most influence on people's values, it's important to recognize that the factors of age, education, and community all play _____ roles. However, their impact varies depending on the context and stage of life a person is at.

First and _____, age is a key factor in shaping one's values. As people grow older, they tend to accumulate more life experiences, which often lead to a _____ in their priorities and beliefs. A case in point is younger individuals might _____ things like career success or personal freedom, but as people age, they may place more importance on family, health, or contributing to society. This progression reflects the natural evolution of values as individuals move through different life stages.

Now, turning to education, it's worth _____ its significant influence. A well-rounded education, particularly one that encourages critical thinking and broadens perspectives, can _____ affect how a person sees the world and interacts with others. Educational institutions expose individuals to diverse ideas, ideologies, and cultures, which can challenge _____ notions and introduce new ways of thinking. For example, students who engage in discussions around ethics, philosophy, or social justice are likely to develop strong values related to _____ and equality.

Lastly, the community in which a person is raised or currently belongs to has a substantial _____ on their values. Community values often stem from cultural, religious, or social norms, and they shape how people view everything from relationships to social responsibility. For instance, someone growing up in a _____, conservative community might value tradition and conformity, whereas someone from a more liberal or diverse community may prioritize individualism or social change.

To recap, while all three factors—age, education, and community—are crucial in _____ people's values, education stands out as the most influential in fostering personal growth and broadening one's worldview. However, the _____ between these factors can vary greatly depending on individual circumstances, making the influence of values a complex and dynamic process.
