 - That's how scientists know they're marine animals, not fish.
 - Dolphins find out what's around them by using clicking noises.

LEARNING ABOUT DOLPHINS

My experience volunteering at a dolphin centre over the summer

I live in Western Australia, where there are loads of marine animals, but dolphins are among my favourites, so when I saw an advert for teenagers to take part in a volunteer project called Dolphin Days, I decided to join. As volunteers we had to work in groups to create information sessions and activities for children visiting the centre. This meant doing our own research about dolphins and deciding what was most interesting.

(1) We discovered that scientists think they actually have conversations with each other! (2) The dolphins may be talking about where the best fish are or if there is a dangerous shark in the area.

We can hear some of the noises dolphins make but they also make other sounds, which the human ear can't hear. I was surprised to find out that they find food using 'echolocation'. This is when a sound travels to an object, which gives an 'echo' – the sound comes back and can be heard again.

(3) When they hear their echo, the dolphins know the object's shape and size, and can decide if it is a fish or octopus, which might be good to eat, or just a rock.

The volunteer group I took part in invented an activity that was a lot of fun. First, we covered the children's eyes with a scarf. Then, they had to try and find different objects in the room.

(4) They discovered that if you go closer to an object, like a box, you can hear the sound coming back from it, but you have to listen very carefully!

These Dolphin Days were only a small part of a project to teach people that our oceans need to be respected and protected.

(5) This is essential to provide a safe home for the wildlife there.

Exam
advice

1 Look at this exam task and a student's answer. Number the paragraphs in the correct order.

Your English teacher has asked you to write a story.
Your story must begin with this sentence.
I was excited when I read the text message!

A ☐

I shouted, 'Mum! I'm going to Paris to play in the championship!' but she didn't answer. I ran downstairs to find her. Unfortunately, I didn't see that my dog was coming out of the living room.

B ☐

I fell hard on the floor and heard a horrible noise. Then, my arm started to hurt. Mum came out of the kitchen, looked at it and said, 'I think you've broken it!' That was the end of my trip to Paris.

C ☐

I was excited when I read the text message! It was unbelievable! The volleyball club had chosen me to play in the team for the European championship.

2 Write the sentences with the correct punctuation.

Example:

Katie asked where are you going

Katie asked, 'Where are you going?'

- 1 Lucas said I've hurt my leg
- 2 The police officer asked when did you arrive home
.....
- 3 Marina announced I'm going to America
.....
- 4 Charlie replied I don't know
.....

3 Write the sentences in Exercise 2 in reported speech.

Example:

Katie asked where I was going.
