Living Online

These days, many young people spend several hours a day on social media platforms like Instagram, TikTok, and Snapchat. These platforms are not just for fun—they're also a way to communicate, learn, and even create content. With just a few taps, users can scroll through hundreds of posts, like photos, watch videos, or react to stories.

For 17-year-old Mia, social media is part of her everyday life. "I usually check my apps as soon as I wake up," she says. "First, I scroll through TikTok to watch new videos. Then I open Instagram and check my DMs to see if any friends have sent me a message during the night."

Mia also enjoys sharing her life online. "When I go out with friends, I always take a few pictures. Later, I post them on Instagram, and I always tag the people I'm with. It's fun because sometimes they share it on their page too."

Besides sharing photos, Mia likes to ask her followers for opinions. "I often use polls in my stories. For example, I ask: 'Which dress should I wear?' or 'What should I eat today?' People love voting!"

But Mia knows there are limits. "Sometimes I spend too much time on my phone. That's when I decide to log out for a while. I read, go outside, or meet my friends in person. It's important to have a balance."

Mia believes social media is helpful when used wisely. "It keeps me connected, and I've learned a lot from videos and posts. But real life is important too, and I don't want to forget that."
