The term STEM stands for Science, Technology, Engineering, and Mathematics. In the past, these fields were thought to be mainly for boys. Girls were held back by prejudices and expectations which influenced their education and career paths. Although the situation has improved now, not many female students are pursuing STEM courses. A report by UNESCO in 2017 shows that women only account for 35% of STEM students in higher education worldwide. This is a worrying sign, especially when STEM jobs are now considered as the careers of the future.

Governments and organizations are trying their best to encourage girls and women to join STEM fields. UNESCO, for example, aims to improve the participation of females in STEM education and employment. Hopefully that will reduce the gender gap in STEM professions. The organization also wishes to help countries to have gender-responsive STEM education. Last but not least, they want to raise awareness of STEM's importance among girls and women. It is likely that there will be more and more female pioneers and leaders in STEM in the future.

- 36. STEM fields are just for boys. _____
- 37. The situation has become worse for girls in STEM now. _____
- 38. Nowadays there are more men than women in STEM. _____
- 39. Governments think it's important to encourage STEM female students. _____
- 40. UNESCO only wants to help countries to receive STEM education. _____
