Life without electricity

Imagine a kitchen without electricity. There is no fridge, no washing machine and no microwave. What difference have these things made to everyday life?

Let's start with the fridge. It keeps things cool, and this means that fresh items stay good to eat and drink for longer. Before fridges began to appear in homes in the 1940s, people had to buy fresh food like meat and milk every day. The bad thing about this was daily shopping. Most people didn't have a car at this time so they could only buy what they could carry The good thing, perhaps, was that people didn't throw away as much food.

In the UK, people started to buy washing machines in the 1950s and 60s. Before then, all washing was done by hand, and this took lot of time. In some countries, one day a week was used just for washing clothes and sheets. How much time do your parents spend washing clothes?

The invention of the microwave oven in the 1960s changed the way people prepared meals. Food scientists have said it has also reduced the amount of home-cooked food which people eat. How many of your meals come from the microwave?
