Read the following text about film-making.

It's not easy to be successful in the film industry. You need to know what you're doing. It all begins with finding a good script to work with. If you have a good idea for a film, you could write the script yourself, otherwise there are plenty of eager screenwriters just waiting for their work to be noticed!

The next step is money. You need some sort of budget that tells you how much money you have available to pay your actors and film crew. You may also need to rent filming equipment such as cameras and lights. You will also need to set aside an amount to promote the film when it is released: interviews with the cast, posters and memorabilia, etc. It is the producer's job to sort out the funding of the project. The producer is the head of the whole project. If you raise and organise all the money, then you are the producer.

Once you've found a script you like, and have secured the funding you require, you need to develop the plot and choosing the right people to play each role. Having a good and harmonious cast will make the director's job a lot easier! You need to hire people to design and make the costumes, as well as for hair and makeup, so that your actors can look more like the characters they are playing.

If your film isn't in English, you may want to hire someone to translate the script it into subtitles that can be shown at the bottom of the screen. Films used to be dubbed into other languages, but audiences found that the actors sounded unnatural and that the voice and lip-movements were out of synch. It is much more popular for a film to be subtitled nowadays.
