Introducing the Topic

People make decisions every day. They decide what clothes to wear and what food to eat. To make good decisions, people need practice. They must learn which decisions are good and which ones are bad. Children need to practice making decisions, too. However, many parents make decisions for their children. They worry that their children will make the wrong decisions.

Adults have to make decisions all the time. Children should practice this to be ready for their adult lives. But is it okay for children to make their own decisions?

Children Should Make Decisions

First, children will have to make decisions alone when they leave home.

If parents always make decisions for them, they cannot be independent.

So they should practice it when they are young. Second, children can be confident. When they are happy with their decisions, they feel proud of themselves. They learn that they can control their lives. For instance, if you decide to study one more hour for a school test, you will probably get a better grade. You learn that you can make good decisions. Then, you will feel better about yourself.

Children Should Not Make Decisions

For one, children do not have enough experience to make decisions. They may not know what is good and what is bad later. For example, a child could decide not to go to a good middle school. Years later, the child might regret this because it is harder to attend a good high school and college.

Second, children may make bad decisions based on peer pressure. One professor found that peer pressure is a major factor in children's decision making. For example, many teenagers start smoking by peer pressure.

This is not a good way to make choices.
