Read the conversation. Then complete the sentences with the correct answers.

David: Hey, Grace! What are your plans this weekend?

Grace: Nothing really, David. Why do you ask?

David: Well, a few of us are going to volunteer at a soup kitchen downtown on Saturday morning. Would you like to join us?

Grace: Sure! But what's a soup kitchen? Is that a place where you give food to homeless people?

David: Yes, for people who live on the streets, or to any person who is hungry and needs some help.

Grace: Ah, like me?

David: Ha, ha. Not exactly.

Grace: Okay, so where are you going to meet?

David: Do you know where the old post office is?

Grace: Yeah?

David: Well, from the old post office, you go down Fourth Street to McKinley Avenue and then turn left. Go straight on McKinley until you see a convenience store on your right. We'll meet in the parking lot at 8 and walk together from there.

Grace: Sounds good! Thanks for inviting me!

Short Answer

Read the passage. Then complete the sentences.

When you got a cold as a child, what did your parents give you to help you feel better? Did you drink a special tea or eat a certain meal? Your answer will probably be different than someone from another country. Here are a few ways people treat the common cold from around the world:

Dominican Republic: People drink "sancocho" to treat colds. It's a soup with different kinds of meat and vegetables.

Japan: Parents tell their children to smell onions to recover faster from a cold.

Russia: Children swallow "gogol mogul" to help their throats feel better. This drink has milk, eggs, and sugar in it.

Mali: A kind of tea made of lemon leaves and a little sugar helps with the cold in this African country.

United States: "You should drink orange juice." This is what American parents tell their children when they start feeling sick.

The next time you get a cold, why don't you choose one of these "medicines" to try? You'll understand what kids from other countries go through when they're feeling sick, and you might discover the perfect treatment for yourself!

27. This passage is mainly about different _____ around the world.

28. In _____, you don't eat or drink anything to help with the cold.
