A Healthy Media Diet

Recently, I've been trying to maintain a more balanced intake of news and social media. A few months ago, after a conversation with some friends, I realised I had been in a bit of an 'echo-chamber online' regarding the news; all the (1) I was reading was just repeating the same things over and over. I wanted to broaden my worldview a bit, and when I looked at the sources I was reading, I realised some of them were a bit extreme and even (2) I started looking at different communities online to get a wider view of the news. It was definitely eye-opening. I found that a lot of the opinions I had of those "on the other side" were far from reality. Talking with people holding different ideas and values helped me (3) their way of thinking and arguments that I had not fully understood before. While I have to admit it was frustrating at times, I'm planning on sticking to it and even getting into more technical sources, like professional or scholarly (4)

Finding a Story

Working for a small town local newspaper certainly has its ups and (0) downs. I love being able to get out into the community and speak to people from all different kinds of backgrounds. In addition, getting access (1) local public figures is much easier than at the national level. For the (2) part, we can rely on stories about the weather, local sports teams, things (3) that. However, some weeks we do have what we call "slow news days". The challenge then is to dig into the community and find something to (4) about to fill the paper the next day. A few tricks I have for dealing with slow news days is to head to a supermarket and ask people their thoughts on some national issues, or problems that people complain about around town.

Dear Editor,

I am writing in (0) RESPONSE to the recent reports that came from the city hall that (1) _____ of a new sports centre on 4th Street will not disrupt traffic through the city centre. This (2) _____ is yet more proof of the (3) _____ nature of the mayor and the city council. Yours faithfully,
