Plastic is everywhere. It's incredibly useful and our life wouldn't be the same without it. Now, you probably don't throw anything into the sea, but did you know 10% of all the plastic in the world ends up there? It comes from ships, from litter on beaches, the wind carries it from land and rivers take it out to sea.

In fact, somewhere in the Pacific Ocean there is an enormous area of floating plastic called the Great Garbage patch. Nobody knows exactly how big it is, but some people say it's the size of the USA! It's the world's largest rubbish dump. Why does it happen? The strong ocean currents push everything into a huge vortex of rubbish that stays in one place. Everything that is made of plastic (balls, tyres, syringes, toothbrushes, toys, bottle tops, plastic bags, etc.) ends up in this huge garbage patch.

Charles Moor, the oceanographer who discovered it in 1997, believes it contains 100 million tons of plastic. This plastic is dangerous for marine life because fish swallow it, birds feed it to their babies, and animals like sea turtles get trapped in plastic nets. In fact, each year about 1 million sea birds and 100,000 marine animals die because of plastic.

The patch also reduces the amount of microscopic plankton that fish can find to eat. This is because it contains 3 kilos of plastic for each half kilo of plankton. But the most harmful plastic is invisible, because ocean waves and sunlight break up the plastic into tiny pieces. These particles are easily swallowed and they can carry man-made chemicals, which get into the food chain. 'What goes into the ocean goes into animals and onto your dinner plate,' says Dr Jon Erikson, a marine researcher.

The Environmentalist David de Rothschild took a 12,000 mile journey across the Pacific Ocean in a boat made of 12,500 recycled plastic bottles called the Plastiki. He wanted everyone to know about the dangers of plastic and to show practical ways to recycle. We can all do something to help. Use less plastic, recycle more and pick up litter!

The concept of flipped learning is largely credited to Jonathan Bergmann and Aaron Sams, a set of Colorado high school teachers who decided to start adding audio to their PowerPoints back in 2007, posting them online to students who were absent from class would still get a chance to hear what their teacher had to say. The teachers saw that these videos weren't just beneficial for students who needed to play catch-up. They were being watched by kids who were in school to hear the lessons too. The recordings were helping to reinforce learning.

Bergmann and Sams began pre-recording all of their lectures, and today's flipped classroom was born. Since then, teachers who have adopted flipped classrooms have turned to introducing lessons with digitized lectures, with viewing typically done outside of the classroom as homework, or at-home reading then using their class time to engage students in more active learning. That can mean everything from group activities to peer teaching. Essentially, learning has been flipped from using homework as a way to follow a lecture up with problem-solving or group projects. Instead, the homework is where students have a concept presented, and their flipped classroom is where they do their problem-solving or projects.

During the pandemic, this flipped learning became a necessity for many teachers, especially those in a hybrid model who were trying to maximize their in-class time with students. And the flipped classroom model has been seen by some teachers as a way to provide a homework alternative that makes better use of students' time, as students are not expected to come up with answers to problems at home when they need their teacher's assistance.
