

Traditional afternoon tea: the epitome of indulgence in the finest English manor, a culinary experience that feels all the cozier when London is yet again ____ and _____. The legendary luxury hotel Savoy has been serving the classic tea time since opening its doors in _____. “Welcome to the Savoy. My name is Elaine, one of the afternoon tea _____. Please, allow me to show you the afternoon tea experience.” Afternoon tea consists of several elements. One of them is, of course, the tea itself, followed by finger sandwiches, usually with cucumber, salmon, eggs, and chicken and curry sauce, accompanied by two canapes per person, scones with lemon curd cream, strawberry jam and clotted cream, and, finally, a selection of bite-sized cakes and pastry. [...]

It wouldn't be afternoon tea without the actual tea and guests have ____ varieties to choose from, the most _____ of which is a ____ tea produced especially for the hotel, the Savoy Breakfast tea, and following tea drinking etiquette is strongly recommended [...].

The tradition of afternoon tea dates back to ____ and was invented by The Duchess of Bedford, a lady in waiting to Queen Victoria. She thought there was too much of a gap between lunch and dinner, so she asked her surface to in the afternoon to make sandwiches, to make scones, to make cakes, and she really enjoyed it. She was eating it and she loved it, so she started inviting her friends for it as well...

