The sea churned like a cauldron, its black waves crashing violently against one another. Lightning tore across the sky in jagged streaks, briefly illuminating the chaos below. The air was heavy with salt, sharp and stinging as it whipped into every crevice of skin. The wind howled with a wild, untamed fury, rattling the ship's ropes until they sang with strain. Overhead, clouds swelled into monstrous towers, smothering the faint light of the moon. The deck glistened with water, slick and treacherous, while every plank groaned beneath the endless assault. Each booming clap of thunder seemed to shake the world itself, echoing across the endless expanse. In every direction, only storm and sea remained, a vast, merciless expanse of water and sky locked in battle.	The storm struck suddenly, tearing the calm night apart. One moment the waves lapped gently against the hull; the next, they rose like walls of black water. I gripped the rail, knuckles white, as the ship tilted violently. "Hold on!" the captain roared, his voice barely cutting through the wind's shriek. Rain lashed my face, blinding me, but I stumbled across the slick deck toward the mast. Another crash—thunder shook the air as lightning revealed the monstrous waves towering above us. My heart hammered; the sea seemed determined to swallow us whole. A rope whipped past, and I seized it, clinging with every ounce of strength. Around me, crewmen shouted, slipping, pulling, fighting to survive. In that chaos, one thought burned clear: if we let go, the sea would win.
