Nowadays, fewer people want to move to cities because city life has several drawbacks compared to suburban areas. While cities may offer more job opportunities and services, they also come with many challenges that affect people's daily lives.

One major issue is the high cost of living. The bigger the city is, the more expensive things become. Housing, petrol, food, and drinks are often much costlier than in smaller towns. Apart from that, city dwellers suffer from serious noise and air pollution. Busy traffic, overcrowded neighborhoods, and continuous construction projects create loud noise and a dusty environment. These problems can badly affect people's health, causing stress, breathing problems, and sleep disturbances.

Another big problem is the lack of space. Most people in cities live in small apartments or narrow houses, with very little outdoor space. Parks and playgrounds are limited, so many teenagers choose to spend time in shopping malls or entertainment centers rather than enjoying physical activities in open areas.

Although local governments are trying to fix these issues, more needs to be done. They should reduce living costs, improve air quality, and add more green spaces. These improvements would help make city life healthier, safer, and more enjoyable for everyone.
