In the campaign for the presidency in 1828, Andrew Jackson's opponents called him a jackass for his views. Jackson turned this label into an advantage. He used the donkey in his campaign posters. The donkey appeared in a cartoon for the first time to represent Jackson's stubbornness during the battle over the Second Bank of the United States. In the cartoon on this page, Thomas Nast associated the donkey with the Democratic Party for the first time. Nast intended the donkey as a criticism of the Copperheads, an anti-war faction of the Democratic Party. The lion is Secretary of War Edwin Stanton, who had died. The cartoon is titled "A Live Jackass Kicking a Dead Lion." The donkey symbol caught on, and Nast continued to use it to represent Democrats.
