Aesop's fable: The honest woodcutter

Once there was a poor woodcutter. He had a simple iron axe which he used every day to cut wood. One day, the woodcutter dropped his axe into the river. He was very sad and started to cry. Suddenly an old man appeared. 'I can help you find your axe,' said the man, and he dived into the river. When he returned, he was holding an axe made of gold. 'Is this your axe?' asked the old man. 'No, it isn't,' replied the woodcutter. So the old man dived into the river again, and this time, when he came out, he was holding an axe made of silver. 'Is this your axe?' he asked, and again the woodcutter said no. Finally, the man dived in for a third time and this time when he returned he was holding the woodcutter's simple iron axe.

'You are a very honest woodcutter,' said the old man. 'Here is your axe, but you can also keep the silver and the gold axes.'

The woodcutter was very happy. He returned to his village and showed everyone his silver and gold axes. The woodcutter's neighbour listened to his story and was jealous. So the next day he went to the river, dropped his iron axe into it, and started to cry loudly. Immediately, the old man appeared and offered to look for the axe. He dived into the river and returned with an axe made of gold. 'Is this your axe?' he asked. 'Yes!' said the greedy man. 'You are lying!' said the old man, angrily, and then he disappeared. So in the end, the greedy neighbour had no axe.
