Good neighbours become good friends

A popular Australian TV show once said, 'Good neighbours become good friends'. It sounds great, but how true is it? It wasn't always the case in the show, with neighbours regularly falling out with each other.

It might be easier to make friends with neighbours rather than going out to meet new people, but it isn't everyone's choice. It's great being able to get together every day without having to make complex plans but how do you know they're the kind of people you like?

After living in my street for five years, I still hardly knew my neighbours, even those in the house next door. A quick 'hello' in the morning, that's all, until one day I lost my house keys. It was a cold day, and I was amazed to see that people on my street came to save me. One invited me in to get warm, another recommended somewhere to buy new keys.

Since then, I've got to know all my neighbours better. I've learned that we all went to university and have had good jobs, and I didn't expect the man old enough to be my grandfather to have such a good sense of humour! A family from another country is moving here soon, and I'll be the first person to welcome them to the street.

It's not always perfect. I love being outside, but that's not much fun when neighbours are playing music while they tidy their gardens. I don't say anything though, because they don't ask me to move my car when I leave it right in front of their house.

I'm moving away next year. Not because of the neighbours, but to be closer to my family, and I'll be more upset to leave than I expected. We haven't known each other long enough to write or phone once I leave, but I won't wait five years to introduce myself in my new street. In fact, I'm already planning a party to get to know everyone as soon as I move in!
