Jobs with a Twist

Everyone knows what doctors, teachers, and lawyers do. And you probably know about less typical jobs, too, such as video game designers and architects. But have you ever heard of the following jobs?

Anxiety Coach

Anxiety coaches are professionals who help people overcome their fears. Many times, they are therapists. One method therapists may use is exposure therapy. In this method, people are exposed to the fear so that they get used to it. It helps them train their brains not to fear something. Some coaches use humor to help people overcome fears. For example, they may tell a person who is afraid of public speaking to use humor at the beginning of the speech to relax. In addition to the fear of public speaking, some of the most common fears anxiety coaches help people with are the fear of heights and the fear of flying. Anxiety coaches need to have training in mental health, and they often get certified in a health-related field. Therapists who work with people to overcome fears may have similar training, but unlike anxiety coaches, they must also have a college degree. Their degrees may be in various fields, such as psychology, social work, nursing, or counseling.

Comedy Writer

Having a sense of humor can help you get through a difficult day at any job, but what if you had to be funny for your job? Comedy writers have to be funny in order to get paid! They may write for TV shows and movies, and they also can write jokes for comedians. While it's not a requirement, it does help to have a college degree in writing or a similar field to be a comedy writer. People in this line of work often start by writing for little or no money to get some experience. What can help potential comedy writers is to practice their skills by writing funny posts on social media. Making connections and working with others in the field also benefit people who are in this profession. Many connections can also be made by taking comedy writing workshops and classes. Finally, whether it's sarcasm or slapstick—it definitely helps to have a unique writing style.

Placement Specialist

Have you ever thought about getting a job helping people get jobs? That's what a job or career placement specialist does. A job placement specialist often works for a company that helps match candidates with employers. A company may hire a specialist who works for a job placement organization to find people for specific jobs at the company. The placement specialist must know the details about the jobs and work with candidates to find the best matches. The specialist may do pre-interviews for the employer to find out the candidates' skills, training, and experience. The specialist may also have to write ads to find candidates. In addition, they often advise candidates about what additional training they should consider to better help them in obtaining jobs. A job placement specialist must have at least a high school degree. Furthermore, a college degree in human resources or a related field is often wanted.

Would you consider one of these jobs? You can make a career out of just about any interest you have! And if you're not sure what you want to do—talk to a career placement specialist for help!
