Read the following passage about languages in Vietnam and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questionsfrom 23 to 30.

There are countless initiatives around the world working to build sustainable, compassionate, and cooperative communities. However, the most widely known movements often focus on urban development, environmental protection, and economic growth. But what about the smaller, local projects? According to the Global Atlas of Social Change, about one-third of community-driven initiatives are focused on small-scale, localized efforts. These grassroots projects are often at risk of being overshadowed by larger global movements. In fact, 150 small-scale initiatives have been discontinued between 2015 and 2023 due to lack of support.

Unfortunately, when a community project is lost, we also lose the social bonds and unique solutions that these communities bring. That's because different communities have different ways of living and addressing local needs. For example, the project to reduce waste in small villages in India is deeply tied to traditional practices. The village leaders use local wisdom to create zero-waste systems. One example of this is the word jugaad, which refers to a creative or resourceful solution to a problem. And the concept pukka means a solution that is sustainable and long-lasting.

In some areas, people are working hard to preserve these local traditions. Many schools in rural regions of Nepal are teaching traditional farming methods to young students. This helps connect them to their rural culture and ways of life. Similarly, in parts of Africa, local communities are organizing programs to protect and preserve indigenous languages. The goal is to raise awareness and ensure these practices are not lost.

Technology offers a promising solution for promoting and preserving these community efforts. The *Community Voices*project, for instance, has created digital platforms where people can record their local traditions, stories, and knowledge. These recordings are accessible to everyone online, allowing future generations to learn from the experiences and wisdom of their ancestors.

Read the following passage about for a better community and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions from 31 to 40.

[I] Many factors contribute to the creation of a successful community, from effective communication to shared goals and values. [II] By 2030, experts predict that more communities will focus on sustainability, social equity, and inclusivity to adapt to the changing needs of the population. [III] The process of building a good community is multifaceted and includes addressing both the strengths and weaknesses of existing systems. [IV]

A number of elements are essential for a thriving community. One of the key factors is active citizen participation, where members work together to solve common problems and share responsibilities. Another important element is social cohesion, where diverse groups interact harmoniously, fostering mutual respect and understanding. Communities that emphasize education and support systems are also more likely to thrive, as they provide the tools for personal and collective growth. On the other hand, there are challenges that need to be addressed, such as inequality, lack of access to resources, and environmental degradation.

Despite these challenges, the rewards of a well-structured community are numerous. Strong communities provide a sense of belonging, help reduce social isolation, and promote higher overall well-being. Additionally, sustainable practices such as local food production, energy efficiency, and waste management can help reduce the environmental footprint. However, building a better community requires a commitment to inclusivity, where all members, regardless of their background, are valued and given equal opportunities.

Read the following passage about Building a Better Community and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questionsfrom 23 to 30.

There are many ways young people today can contribute to building a better community. One important way is through volunteering. Volunteers help in many areas, from cleaning up the environment to tutoring younger students. In many communities, there are organizations dedicated to helping young people get involved in volunteer work. For example, programs that encourage young people to help the elderly or assist in food banks have become more popular in recent years.

Another way young people can make a difference is by getting involved in local government or advocacy groups. Some youth organizations work to influence public policy on important issues, such as climate change, education, and healthcare. Many young people are now leading protests and rallies to raise awareness about social issues. Through these activities, they not only learn about social justice but also contribute to improving their communities.

Technology also plays an important role in modern community-building. With the rise of social media, young people can now connect with others who share their concerns. They can spread messages of positivity, organize events, or even fundraise for causes they care about. Many organizations now offer online platforms where young people can learn about volunteer opportunities and participate in virtual community-building projects.

The efforts of young people in these areas can help make their communities more inclusive, supportive, and connected. With the right guidance and opportunities, young people can become active citizens who have a lasting impact on their world. (Adapted from CNNnews)

Read the following passage about Building a Better Community for Young People and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions from 31 to 40.

[I] In recent years, the focus on improving communities for young people has gained increasing attention. One of the main factors driving this shift is the growing recognition of the challenges young people face in modern society. [II] Today, young people make up a significant portion of the global population, and by 2030, it is expected that nearly half of the world's population will be under the age of 30. [III] This trend is influenced by various factors, and addressing these challenges requires a comprehensive approach. [IV]

One of the primary challenges young people face is the lack of adequate job opportunities. In many communities, young people struggle to find stable employment, often due to limited access to training or work experience. Additionally, in areas where the economy is less developed, young people are often forced to leave their hometowns to seek work in urban centers, where job prospects are better. Moreover, social and cultural factors such as a lack of support systems, limited opportunities for education, or inadequate recreational spaces can contribute to a sense of disconnection and lack of direction.

On the other hand, there are factors that can help create a better community for young people. Communities with strong education systems, accessible career training programs, and ample job opportunities provide young people with the resources they need to build a better future. Furthermore, the presence of safe, inclusive spaces where young people can socialize, explore their interests, and engage in cultural or sporting activities can greatly enhance their well-being and sense of belonging.

Building a better community for young people requires addressing both the challenges and opportunities they face. Firstly, providing better access to education and job training programs can empower young people to succeed in their chosen careers. Secondly, creating more public spaces for leisure and recreation can give young people a sense of purpose and belonging.
