- B9. Most people who are under the impression that doing something by mistake is quite different from doing something on purpose. In fact, according to by some psychologists, many accidents do not, on the whole, really have happen by chance. There may be good reasons for actions which seem us to be accidental. For example, someone who may fails to arrive on time for a meeting at work may be worried about his or her job, or be in much difficulties at home. In every other words, there are often good reasons for behaviour which seems at first to be accidental. Of course, some else people are involved in more accidents than lots others. These people are known as 'accident prone'. In general, they either suffer from stress, or could have been a physical illness without knowing about it.
