Festivals come with many traditions that bring happiness and joy. However, some of these customs may not be environmentally friendly and may need to be changed for a sustainable future. Below are three of them.

Balloons and sky lanterns: In countries such as China, India, and Japan, releasing balloons or sky lanterns provides a spectacular sight. They are also flown to bring good luck and send wishes to the sky. However, the litter left behind by the balloons and lanterns is hard to decompose. The frames of the lanterns can harm wild animals, and many animals mistake the balloons for food. Lanterns also caused wildfires in the past.

Fireworks: In Australia, the US, and many other countries, there are fascinating fireworks displays that people won't want to miss. However, fireworks actually release a lot of harmful chemicals into the air, causing air pollution. Like sky lanterns, they can also cause fires.

Christmas trees: Real or fake Christmas trees are often displayed in almost every house, office, and shop during the festive season. When Christmas is over and the real trees go to landfills, they produce methane and carbon dioxide, which are two harmful greenhouse gases. Fake trees can be reused for many years, but during their production, harmful pollutants are released into the air. And when they end up in landfills, they will take hundreds of years to decompose.

Read the following passage about trees and mark the letter A, B, C or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions

Trees play an important role in protecting the environment, especially during natural disasters. For centuries, people have recognised that trees help prevent soil erosion and reduce the risk of flooding while serving as natural barriers against storms and landslides.

LIVEWORKSHEETS

Trees can absorb large amounts of water, which is why they are often planted near rivers and along coastlines. Because of this capability, during heavy rains, trees help keep the soil from taking too much water and reduce erosion. Besides, their roots spread through the ground, holding the soil together and helping prevent landslides. In areas where forests have been cut down, disasters like floods and erosion are more likely to occur. This shows that deforestation increases the risk of damage to the environment and the safety of communities. Another benefit of trees is that they can slow down strong winds. When hurricanes and storms hit, forests can protect homes and cities by breaking the force of the wind. A well-preserved forest can save lives and reduce damage to infrastructure.

Replanting trees after a disaster is essential for recovery. In some places, communities have started planting new trees to replace those lost in fires or storms. By doing so, they are restoring the environment and helping to prevent future disasters. Planting trees also contributes to the fight against climate change, as healthy forests can better absorb carbon dioxide and provide protection against extreme weather.

In conclusion, trees not only provide oxygen and shelter for animals, but they also help protect us from the dangers of natural disasters. Investing in forests today means creating a safer future for generations to come.
