Translating Love: The Five Love Languages

Read the text and choose the correct answers.

Love is a powerful emotion that can be expressed in many different ways. According to Dr. Gary Chapman, there are five main "love languages" that people use to show their affection. Understanding them can help you navigate the ups and downs of relationships and communicate your feelings more effectively.

If your love language is words of affirmation, you value verbal expressions of appreciation. To show love to someone who speaks this language, try saying "I love you" or "I appreciate you" often. You can also leave little notes or texts throughout the day to show your love. Compliment them regularly, give them verbal encouragement and support when they need it, tell them how much you appreciate their presence in your life. Another love language is quality time. If it's yours, you value spending one-on-one time with your loved one. To show love to someone who speaks this language, try setting aside special time for just the two of you, whether it's a date night or a walk in the park. Put away your phone and other distractions and focus on spending time together, express your openness to participating in activities that your partner likes, even if it's not your cup of tea. If someone speaks the language of receiving presents, they value tangible gifts. If it's your partner's, try giving them small gifts, such as a bouquet of flowers or a special piece of jewelry. You can also make them a homemade gift or a craft. Make sure to remember important dates and occasions such as birthdays, anniversaries, and holidays. If your love language is acts of service, you value actions that show you are loved. To show love to someone who speaks this language, try doing things for them, such as cooking dinner, doing the laundry, or running errands. Plan a special surprise such as a romantic dinner or a day out, make them breakfast in bed, help them with their goals and projects. And last but not least, the fifth love language is physical touch. If you speak this language, you value physical contact as a way to show love and appreciation. To make someone who speaks this language feel loved, try holding hands, cuddling, or giving a hug. You can also give them a massage or a back rub to show your love. It's important to show affection in public through holding hands or putting your arm around them.

It's worth noting that there are alternative love languages, for example, physical presence. This love language is all about being physically available for your loved one. People who speak this love language value being in the same room or space as their partner, even if they're not talking or interacting. They feel comforted by the mere presence of their partner. Another one is shared interests. This love language is all about common activities. People who speak this love language value engaging in shared hobbies, such as sports, games, or arts and crafts. One more alternative love language is adventure. It is all about experiencing new and exciting things together, usually on a whim. People who speak this love language value the excitement of adventure, whether it's traveling to new places, trying new activities, or pushing their limits.

It is commonly believed that a person's love language is set and remains the same throughout their life, but in reality, people's love languages may evolve and change as they progress through life and encounter new things. A person who primarily valued physical touch in their youth may find that as they get older, their love language shifts towards acts of service or quality time. It's important to be aware that people change, and their love languages may change as well, it's not set in stone. Additionally, some people may have a combination of love languages, and one may be more dominant at certain times and less dominant at others. Everyone is different and so are their love languages. We should also keep in mind, that love languages are not only for romantic relationships. They can be applied to friendships, family relationships, and even professional relationships.  English_on_the_go

Humans are not the only ones capable of speaking love languages. The universal language of love that is observed in many species of animals is physical touch. For example, primates may use grooming (cleaning and untangling hair and fur) as a way to show love and affection, dogs may use cuddling and licking, and birds may use preening and touching to show love and affection towards their mate.

Let's embrace the beauty of love and make the most of every moment we share.

WHAT DO YOU THINK?

Legal Madness

Read the text and match 1 - 6 to (A-H). There are 2 extra variants you don't need to use.

Ladies and gentlemen, welcome to the wacky world of laws! Are you ready to be amazed and amused by the absurdity of it all? Buckle up, folks, because this ride is going to be a wild one!

1__ Canada

In Canada, pretending to be a witch or a wizard can land you in serious trouble. Not only will you be breaking the law, but you could also face fraud charges for scamming people. The law is in place to prevent fraudulent practices and protect people from being scammed by those pretending to be sorcerers. Because clearly, witches are the only ones capable of fraud, while bankers and politicians are completely trustworthy.

2__ Greece

In Greece, if you wear high heels to ancient sites, you might be turned away at the entrance or even face a fine. This law was put in place to protect the ancient ruins and historical sites from damage. The law is in place to preserve the cultural heritage of Greece. Because, clearly, high heels are the number one enemy of historical preservation, not the thousands of tourists that tread on these sites every day.

3__ Switzerland

In Switzerland, flushing the toilet after 10 PM can land you in hot water. Not only will you risk disturbing your neighbors, but you could also face a fine for breaking the noise pollution laws if they report you to the police. The law is in place to ensure a peaceful night for all residents in the area. Because, obviously, the sound of a toilet flushing is the worst thing that can happen at night, much worse than a party or a crying baby.

4__ Thailand

In Thailand, if you're caught leaving the house without wearing an upper piece of underwear, you could be arrested and charged with indecent exposure. The law aims to promote a sense of modesty in public. It is aimed at maintaining a certain level of decency in the public sphere. Obviously, nothing says 'decent' like being arrested for not wearing underwear beneath your clothes, while walking around in a bikini on a beach in the same country is completely appropriate.

Legal Madness

Read the text and match 1 - 6 to (A-H). There are 2 extra variants you don't need to use.

5__ Saudi Arabia

In Saudi Arabia, women who dare to drive can face arrest and punishment. This law reflects traditional beliefs about gender roles and the idea that women should be protected and not allowed to drive. The law is a reflection of the societal norm in Saudi Arabia. Because, according to Arabian men, women can't be trusted with the responsibility of driving, but entrusting them with raising children and running a household is totally fine.

6__ India

In India, it is illegal to sell and eat meat on certain days of the week in certain areas. This law was passed to respect the religious beliefs of the majority of Hindu population, who consider cows sacred and refrain from consuming beef. Because clearly, the best way to respect a religious belief is by limiting the personal choices and food access of others, isn't it?

Which country's law:

- A can be broken by a crying child?
- B forbids a specific type of footwear to enter certain places?
- C has something to do with bras and T-shirts?
- D will punish you because of the complaints of people living close by?
- E doesn't allow impersonating a magician?
- F forces you to become a vegetarian?
- G displays a major case of gender inequality?
- H imposes some dietary restrictions?

Which law do you find the most absurd? Do you think there are reasonable laws mentioned in the text?
