ECOTOURISM

Ecotourism is a form of travel that focuses on protecting the environment and supporting local communities. Unlike traditional tourism, which may harm natural areas, ecotourism encourages visitors to travel responsibly. It aims to reduce negative impacts on nature while creating economic benefits for local people.

In Vietnam, ecotourism has become increasingly popular in recent years. Places such as national parks, forests, and coastal areas attract both domestic and international tourists. Visitors can explore beautiful landscapes, observe wildlife, and learn about local cultures. For example, tourists may stay in eco-friendly accommodations or join guided tours led by local residents.

One important goal of ecotourism is environmental conservation. Money earned from tourism can be used to protect endangered species and maintain natural habitats. In addition, ecotourism helps raise awareness about environmental issues. Tourists are often educated about how to reduce waste, save energy, and respect wildlife.

However, ecotourism also faces challenges. If too many tourists visit the same place, the environment can still be damaged. Therefore, careful planning and management are necessary to ensure sustainable development.

Overall, ecotourism offers a balance between economic growth and environmental protection. When managed properly, it allows people to enjoy nature while preserving it for future generations.
