Most people grow up in communities and rely on each other plants and animals live in communities, too, in places with the weather, soil and food they need. These communities are ecosystems. They have living parts, such as plants and animals, and nonliving parts, such as rock and water. An ecosystem is like an imaginary web - all the living and non-living parts interact with each other. For example, grass uses sunlight to produce energy A rabbit hides in the grass, grasshoppers feed on it, and a bird weaves it into its nest. If a part of an ecosystem changes, everything changes. Unfortunately, we often upset ecosystems. It is important to keep the weak balance between the parts in an ecosystem.
