At the World Cities Summit, Resilient Cities Network today released a white paper, titled "Urban Eats: How Cities Leverage Opportunities to Build Resilient Food Systems through Circular Pathways". The report argues that food waste presents an untapped business opportunity that can unlock multiple benefits, such as economic growth and green jobs, improved food security and a healthier planet. Globally, 150 million urban residents are food insecure, while cities generate over 2.8 billion tons of organic waste each year. Only 2% of this waste is captured and recycled to contribute to reduced emissions and increased employment, while also recapturing nutrients for growing food.

"Given that cities will consume 80% of the world's food in 2050 while food insecurity continues to rise, it is clear that action must begin there," said Lauren Sorkin, Executive Director of the Resilient Cities Network. "By advancing circular practices that both reduce waste and create value from waste, we can unlock multiple resilience benefits, such as reducing carbon footprint of food, improving food distribution, breaking the dependence on non-renewable inputs in food production, generating jobs and boosting food supply efficiency."

A circular food economy, which builds resilience, would help deliver an adequate food supply to meet global nutritional needs, and support regenerative practices based on reduced waste, recovering nutrients and addressing pollution in the food system.
