In the past, American students did not have to take tests so frequently, and tests did not play such a prominent role in their education. Tests were mainly used to decide where students should be placed in school or what kind of help they needed. Recently, test scores have been published in the newspaper and used as the main way to judge students, teachers, and schools. These scores are used to decide if students pass or fail, where money should be spent, and so on. Tests have recently become a tool for public officials to impose their decisions on schools, and they are enforcing them with great force.

This situation is also unusual when compared to other countries. According to two scholars, "Few countries today give these formal exams to students before the age of sixteen." In the United States, we give standardized tests to children as young as six, even though many experts in early childhood education disagree with this practice. Additionally, few countries rely on multiple-choice tests as heavily as the United States does.

In short, our children are being tested more than ever before in a way that is unmatched in history. Instead of questioning this, many people accept it as normal. As a result, most of today's discourse about education has become very simple, focusing only on raising test scores.
